

On 3/21/1221 HRH King Entmut König of Warmia struck the first blow of the War of Satisfaction with long-time adversary Ardennes by invading the region of Tarvantovaara – an area of traditional importance to the Warmian people. The principal invasion force would cross River Mühlbach at Grafhold but several smaller divisions were assigned to other river crossings both east and west of there.

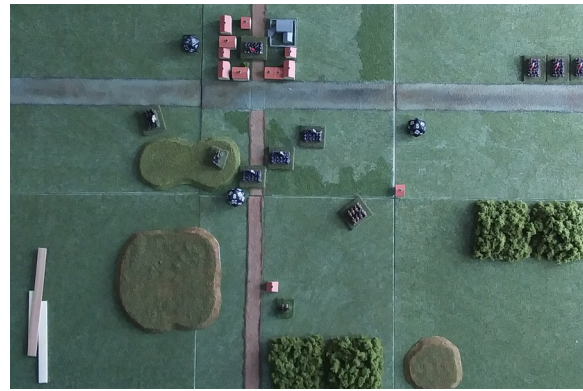

We follow the exploits of the Second Bremenburg under the command of General Franz Marklin, a man of average talent. He has been tasked with taking the crossing at the town of St. Albrecht where a single battalion of fairly green infantry is stationed. Scouts have relayed accurate information on the secondary crossings to Emperor Cadieux and the General Staff who have taken steps to divert what forces they could to these points but who can say if the reinforcements heading to St. Albrecht will get there in time.

Under light rain at 9:00AM on the morning of the 22nd, the Second Bremenburg comes within sight of St. Albrecht from the south and no military activity can be seen in it's vicinity. Only the peal of the church's bell can be heard over the gentle rain. Never-the-less, Marklin approaches the hamlet cautiously preparing to take up positions on the river's bank.

The garrisoned force is inexperienced and their resistance is less than heartfelt. By 11:00AM, they are nearing their breaking point just as the Warmian batteries on the heights pass word of Ardennes forces approaching from the East.

Once the garrison has fallen, Warmian lite infantry and cavalry overrun the town and the line prepares for the arrival of the enemy.

1:00PM

Sadly for The Emperor, the relief forces are too late in coming to stave off the inevitable and after another two hours, the remaining two battalions retire from the field in good order and as night falls, what remains of their fallen units will rejoin the body as it makes camp for the night. St. Albrecht has been captured.
